Abstract

Wound healing is a natural process in humans through which the body restores damaged body tissues. Wound healing mechanism is divided into four main steps: haemostasis, inflammation, proliferation and remodelling. Disturbance in any step of the wound healing lengthens healing time and may result in various skin problems. Indigenous medicines made by traditional people use natural plant sources and plant derivatives thus providing a number of medicines that are consumed nowadays. The natural agents have wound healing properties and also regenerate the damaged tissues. Traditional people use various plant parts in the form of decoctions, extracts and paste for healing cuts, wounds, burns and boils. Pharmacological studies on Indian medicinal plants in which molecular mechanisms of wound healing are few in number. The documentation and validation of these wound healing plants are finite though there are many plants used by indigenous people due to their wound healing properties. Recognizing the important role traditional medicine continues to play, we have undertaken an extensive survey of literature reporting the use of medicinal plants and plant based products for cutaneous wounds. Due to this a review of these plants is important and thus an expensive study of literature was carried out. Bryophyllum calycinum, Sida cordifolia, Euphorbia royleana and Coccinia grandis are some plants used by indigenous people of Himachal Pradesh.

Keywords: Indigenous, Shivalik range, Traditional, Wounds.

Introduction

Wounds are mainly caused due to disabilities which is physical in nature. Wound is a type of disruption in the skin. Which is anatomical and functional and cause an injury. This disruption caused various type of threat to living tissue such as physical, chemical, electrical or microbial threats (Sharma et al., 2021). On the basis of cause of wound creation, wounds are mainly of two types open and closed wounds. Open wounds include incised wounds laceration wounds or tear wounds, abrasion or superficial wounds, puncture wounds, penetration wounds, gunshot wound. The closed wounds include contusions, blisters, seroma, hematoma, crush injuries. Ulcer is a type
